

“To compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical.”

-- Thomas Jefferson, 1786

Over the past two decades, the National Institute for Labor Relations Research (NILRR) has documented the harm inflicted on workers and society by compulsory unionism. Studies published by NILRR have shown that legal sanctions for forced-union dues are correlated with lower real average earnings, below-average growth in the number of people with employment-based health benefits, higher real poverty rates, and higher taxes.

And NILRR’s ever-growing library of Right to Work-related material offers a unique resource for scholars in the field of labor-management relations. But to sustain its educational program and to maintain and update its library, NILRR needs help from the public to support its mission.

The primary function of the National Institute for Labor Relations Research (NILRR) is to serve as an educational research facility for the general public, journalists, scholars and students. NILRR's resources are especially useful for Americans who are actively involved in the fight against compulsory unionism.

The National Institute for Labor Relations Research does not receive any government funding. It relies exclusively on voluntary contributions from the general public.

All donations to the National Institute for Labor Relations Research are tax deductible for IRS purposes.
